Peter is an American tourist who visited Morocco with four of his friends. This is the story of their trip:

[1] I first visited Morocco in 1999 with a couple of friends as a self-guided tourist. We bought plane tickets and went from place to place. We made daily decisions about where to go with help from guidebooks like Lonely Planet. Our primary goal was to encounter people and learn about their culture. During our visit, we met nice people who enjoyed meeting foreigners, willing to spend time with them and know about their countries.

[2] In the town of Tiznit, we were sitting in a public area on a hot summer day when a young man, named Lahcen, came and sat next to me. He began practising his English with me. We had been enjoying a nice conversation for only about 15 minutes when he invited us to his house. We gratefully accepted and found ourselves among a typical Moroccan family. We thought we would only be served a cup of tea and then leave for dinner in a restaurant. We ended up sharing a huge dinner and hours of friendly atmosphere with the family. Because my American friends and I were visiting Morocco for the first time, we were somehow astonished by the customs of eating in the Moroccan family. Unlike in America, eating with your hands is a time-honored tradition in Morocco. If you ever have a chance to visit this country, eat with your right hand using the thumb and the first two fingers.

[3] After the meal, our hosts said that we should not check in to the hotel and they insisted on us sleeping at their home, even after we refused multiple times. Finally, we accepted their kind offer, the five of us staying the night sleeping in the main room of the house. This same scenario was repeated several times all over Morocco, in big cities like Marrakech and Fes as well as in smaller towns. We were always treated with great kindness and hospitality as our hosts offered us food and housing. Those offerings were usually so insistent that we gave in and were humbled to watch Moroccan families treat us like kings.

[4] While visiting Morocco as a tourist, I was looking for a change in my personal life, a new adventure. Following my first visit in 1999, I packed my bags and returned to Morocco, thinking I would just study Arabic for a while. I finally stayed for seven years, first working at a language school and later setting up and running my own business, working with foreigners who were doing business in Morocco.

Model answers (any appropriate answer is accepted)

Task 1: On a school excursion, I would like to go to Chefchaouen. This place is worth visiting for the following reasons. First, it is famous for its beautiful blue streets and traditional houses. Second, it is surrounded by mountains, so we can enjoy the fresh air and go hiking. Finally, we can learn about local history and buy handmade souvenirs.

Task 2: A Talented Person Hicham El Guerrouj is one of the greatest athletes in Moroccan history. He was born in Berkane in 1974. He is a middle-distance runner and he won two gold medals at the Athens Olympic Games in 2004, in the 1500 and 5000 meters. His main talent is speed and endurance, but he is also known for his patience and hard work. He trained for many years before he became a world champion. Today, he is a role model for young people and he encourages them to practise sport. In my opinion, he shows that success comes from talent, discipline and determination.
