[1] In a survey of 1500 adolescents, 51% of American teenagers spend their time switching between a variety of social media apps such as YouTube, TikTok, Instagram and Facebook. On average, they spend 4 hours per day across these platforms. The time spent by boys on social media ranges from 4.1 hours per day for 13-year-olds to 5.8 hours per day for 17-year-olds. Girls of similar ages spend an hour more on social media compared to boys.

[2] Parents have many concerns about their teenagers' use of social media. For 46% of parents, these include having access to inappropriate content, wasting time and being distracted from completing homework. These parents say they are keeping a watchful eye on what their teens do on social media. Some are also imposing screen time limits on the use of the platforms. Some parents even believe that for a better protection of their kids, the law should give them full access to their teens' social media accounts.

[3] In comparing how much time teens spend on social media to the time they spend on their school work, it's not surprising that scrolling wins studying. The majority of teenagers spend about 4 hours per day on social media, but just 29% said they spend that much time doing homework. Parents express their concern about their children being distracted from completing their homework. "I think the amount of technology that kids are exposed to on a daily basis is shocking," said James Steyer, founder of Common Sense Media.

[4] Psychologists have pointed out how social media companies force teens to spend more time on the apps through their engineering and designs. Scientists conclude that teens spending too much time on social media is the result of having problems of self-control. Social media is designed to be addictive. The platforms try to get users to spend as much time as possible scrolling up and down. "They use clever marketing tactics such as frequent notifications and reports of your "likes' and 'retweets'," says John Sharry, a psychologist.

[5] To help their children with social media addiction, Dr. Prinstein, a social therapist, advises parents to start talking with their kids about their use of the platforms. "Limit screen time that interferes with at least 8 hours of sleep a night to ensure healthy brain development among teens," says doctor Prinstein.
